

The Faceless Course Starter Kit

For the woman with real expertise and zero desire to be on camera

If This Has Been Holding You Back

You know things. Real, valuable, hard-won things from years of actual experience. And every time you've thought about teaching it — turning it into a course — one thought has stopped you: “I don't want to be on camera.”

For a long time, that thought was a genuine dead end. It isn't anymore. This guide explains, gently and simply, how courses can now be taught without you ever appearing on screen — and the small decisions that make it work well.

How This Actually Works

There are tools now — sometimes called AI avatars — that can take a script you've written, in your own words, and turn it into a video where a presenter delivers it naturally, without you ever being filmed yourself.

You can choose a ready-made presenter that comes with the tool, or in some cases, build a version based on your own photo. Either way, your actual thinking, your structure, your expertise — all of that stays entirely yours. What changes is simply who appears on screen delivering it.

The Four Decisions You'll Need to Make

1. A ready-made presenter, or one based on your photo?

A ready-made presenter is usually included at no extra cost and is the simplest way to begin. A version built from your own photo tends to cost more and feel a little more personal — many people start with the simpler option first, then decide.

2. How many lessons should your course have?

There's no need to start big. Five focused lessons, each solving one clear problem, is a genuinely complete course. You can always build a longer, more comprehensive version later, once you know the first one works.

3. A full script, or just bullet points?

Writing out exactly what will be said, word for word, produces the smoothest, most natural-sounding result. Bullet points are quicker to prepare but can sound a little stiff. If you're just starting out, a full script is worth the extra time.

4. Where will people actually watch it?

A dedicated course platform offers a tidy, structured experience with progress tracking. A simpler option — a single page with your videos listed in order — can work perfectly well too, especially while you're just getting started.

Where To Go From Here

If this has opened up a possibility that felt closed before, that's exactly the point. What you know is valuable — and it no longer needs to stay locked away simply because the idea of being on camera didn't feel right for you.

This guide is one small piece of a larger framework called Build Your Faceless Course Fast — which walks through the full process, including writing your first script and publishing your very first lesson.
