For the woman with ten ideas and no idea which one to actually start

If You've Ever Felt Stuck Here, This Is For You

Maybe you have a notebook, or a notes app, full of half-formed ideas. A course you could teach. A template you could sell. A service you could offer. And somehow, despite having plenty of ideas, you haven't actually started any of them.

This isn't because you lack ideas, or drive, or ability. It's because "what should I sell" has been treated like a huge, personal, identity-defining decision — when really, it's a much smaller, much more answerable question than that.

This guide gives you five simple questions. Answer them honestly about any idea, and you'll know, clearly, whether it's worth building — without needing months of research or reflection first.

Why This Feels So Hard (And Why It Doesn't Need To)

Most advice about choosing a business idea focuses on passion — "follow what excites you." That advice, while well-meaning, often makes the decision harder, not easier, because almost everything can feel exciting in the imagining stage.

What actually distinguishes an idea worth building isn't how exciting it feels. It's whether real evidence exists that people want it — evidence you can gather in days, not months, before you've invested any real time in building anything.

The Five Questions

1. Is someone already paying for something like this?

This isn't competition to fear — it's proof the problem is real. Search online for similar products or services. If people are already spending money to solve this exact problem somewhere else, that's a genuinely good sign, not a discouraging one.

2. Can I actually deliver this without exhausting myself?

Does this idea fit the energy and time you genuinely have available, or does it quietly require you to become a completely different person — someone with far more hours, energy, or a personality trait you don't naturally have? Be honest here.

3. Could I get a real answer about this in one week?

Could you create a simple version of this — even just a description — and show it to a handful of real people within seven days? If the answer is yes, you're not stuck in research forever. You're one short test away from knowing.

4. Is this a crowded shouting match, or a quieter corner?

If a hundred other people are already offering the exact same thing in the exact same way, you'll need to shout louder than all of them to be noticed. Is there a more specific angle — a particular person, problem, or approach — that isn't as crowded?

5. Would I still feel good about this in 48 hours?

Imagine committing to build a simple version of this over one weekend. Does that feel like relief, or does it feel like dread? If it's dread, that's useful information — not a reason to push through, but a sign to look at a different idea.

An idea doesn't need to be perfect to be worth testing. It needs to pass these five simple checks.

Where To Go From Here

If this helped bring some clarity, that's exactly what it's designed to do. Choosing what to build doesn't need to be a months-long process of reflection — it can be a short, honest conversation with yourself, guided by these five questions.

This guide is a small piece of a larger framework called The Winning Combination — which goes deeper into validating your idea in just seven days, understanding current trends, and finding a less crowded space to build in.
