

The CFO Pricing Card

For the woman who discounts before anyone's even asked

A Moment You Might Recognise

You're about to tell someone your price. And right before the words come out, something in you softens it. "It's usually more, but for you..." "I could do a bit less, if that helps." The discount arrives before anyone's even reacted.

If this feels familiar, please know: this has nothing to do with your actual worth, or the quality of what you offer. It's a pattern, and patterns can be gently understood and shifted.

Why We Do This (It's More Common Than You'd Think)

Naming a price and holding it, without softening it, means risking that someone might say no. That risk creates a small, real discomfort in the body — the same kind of discomfort connected to being judged or rejected.

Discounting before anyone's objected is a way of avoiding that discomfort before it even arrives. It feels like kindness. It's actually a way of protecting yourself from a rejection that hasn't happened yet — and often never would have.

Understanding this doesn't mean the discomfort disappears instantly. It means you can recognise what's happening, and choose differently anyway.

A Simple Way to Think About Your Price

Instead of guessing at a number that feels safe, think about three specific numbers. Together, they give you a price you can actually stand behind.

The Floor

This is the smallest number that genuinely covers your time and any real costs involved. Not zero — an honest reflection of what your hours and expertise are actually worth. Below this number, you are quietly paying to work.

My floor: £_____

The Market Position

Look at three to five similar offers — not identical, just comparable in scope and quality. What do they charge? This gives you a realistic sense of what people are already used to paying for something like this.

Comparable range: £_____ to £_____

The Ceiling

This is the one most people never calculate: what is this actually worth to the person receiving it? If it saves her weeks of confusion, or helps her earn back the cost within her first month of using it, that's real value — often far more than the floor number alone suggests.

Estimated value to her: £_____

What To Do In The Moment

Say your price once, clearly. Then stop talking. The silence that follows will feel uncomfortable — that's normal, and it's not a sign anything is wrong. It's simply the space the other person needs to consider what you've said.

If she needs a moment, let her have it. You do not need to fill that silence with a justification, an apology, or an immediate discount.

A Small Practice For This Week

The next time you're about to discount before anyone has objected — pause. Just notice the urge. You don't have to act on it. Simply noticing it, once, clearly, begins to loosen its grip.

Your price is a signal of value — not an apology for existing.

Where To Go From Here

If any of this felt familiar, you are absolutely not alone — this is one of the most common, least talked-about patterns among capable, talented women.

This guide is one small piece of a larger framework called Ethical Selling — which goes deeper into sales conversations that feel calm rather than pushy, and how to hold your price with genuine confidence, not performed confidence.

It's part of The Successful Woman's System — a complete framework for building something real, at a price that honours what it's actually worth.
